In this paper, an adaptation of the indicator for the assessment of human health risks (ADI) will be described with respect to the quality and validity of its components, consistency with the framework for the evaluation and assessment of the sustainability of human health risks to chemicals, and the hierarchy of toxicological endpoints and health effects endpoints. The ADI will be presented as a global indicator that will be useful for assessment of the sustainability of human health risks at the ecosystem level; and that may be used in the assessment of the risks associated with a toxic substance. It is recommended that this proposal for the adaptation of the ADI be tested and subsequently adapted in a transparent process within the region of WHO, with the support of its member states, and its risk governance bodies.
